SYNOPSIS

Sarah is a gifted young middle-distance runner. Her life changes when she's offered admission to Quebec's best university athletics program, in Montreal – far from her suburban Quebec City home. Sarah doesn't have her mother's financial support for the move, or any support at all: her mother worries that leaving will be bad for Sarah's health and life. But Sarah is stubborn, and moves to Montreal anyway, with her friend Antoine. Though barely out of their teens, they get married because they want the best scholarships and loans. Marriage turns out to be completely different from what the naïve 20-year-olds expected. Sarah doesn't want to hurt anyone with the choices she makes, it's just that she loves running more than anything else.

Sarah préfère la course looks at the pursuit of a goal, and explores the anxieties of a young athlete who lives to run. Unlike most sports films, the story is not concerned with showing how big her dream is, or dwelling on her positive results. Rather, it shows the sacrifices and consequences that come with the dream, both for the athlete and the people close to her. In this film, the dream is beautiful and intoxicating, but also destructive and selfish – like the protagonist. Sarah learns about life on fast-forward. She learns, like many people her age, to make choices and live with the consequences.

Sarah does not fit with the usual preconceptions about femininity, whether in terms of her clothing, social life or reserved personality. Antoine, the friend with whom she moves to Montreal, also reveals an interesting side of masculinity: he is more focused on his emotions and more demonstrative than we are conditioned to expect. They are “Sarah” and “Antoine” first and foremost, and “a woman” and “a man” incidentally. By deciding to marry, they force themselves into a conventional heterosexual family mould at a very young age. Even though they tell themselves it’s only for money, the word “marriage” is still significant. The film explores the symbolic notion of marriage and its power over individuals and their feelings.
